Russia, crucially, did not approve of this and worked to stop it. The Brezhnev Doctrine is the moment Soviet policy went from verbal to outright physical threats, the moment the USSR said it would invade anyone who stepped out of its line. It came during Czechoslovakia's Prague Spring, a moment when (relative) freedom was in the air, if only briefly.

Parallels between May '68 and the Prague Spring are largely the result of the simultaneity of the events: in important respects, the political goals of the two movements were antithetical. Nevertheless, central European dissent had a significant impact on the French anti-totalitarian Left after 1968, argues Jacques Rupnik.
