At this juncture, it is interesting to compare proofs in cryptography to proofs in complexity theory. In particular, for an undergraduate audience, the most familiar reductions proofs involve proving the NP-completeness of problems. Let us recall how a proof that a language  $L$  is NP-complete. Proving that  $L \leq_{NP} NP$  is not a reduction.

Electronic Voting. Given that the same assumptions --- distrust of social institutions, superiority of mathematical proof, and design goals understood to transcend time, space, and culture --- are brought to bear on the process, I argue that similar difficulties are bound to occur and that cryptography's sociotechnical agenda might be better served by a greater engagement with the material world.
