Creative success need not be linear; it is possible in many different ways. Dogged, linear step-by-step fol- lowing of process stages can be limiting in many situa- tions where variation is clearly needed. Using the same seven stages, there are at least four other ways to or- ganize their interrelationships.

A pair of authors, Don Koberg and Jim Bagnall, proposed the concept of "Morphological Forced Connections" in the early 1970's. Their approach required the creation and use of a matrix in several steps: Listing the attributes of an item or situation in horizontal columns. Create rows under each column containing alternative attributes.
