This is not to say that aid cannot positively influence violent contexts and facilitate harnessing peace. However, the mandate should be clear in prioritising the mitigation of human suffering. Drawing on these propositions, for their approaches not to have reverse effects, Anderson argues that aid agencies need to be aware of the systemic underpinnings of a conflict. [17]

About Farm Aid
Do No Harm began in 1993 as the Local Capacities for Peace Project (LCPP). Many, many colleagues in humanitarian and development work saw aid being used to support local populations in their efforts to escape conflict and to build their own peace. At the same time, they also saw aid being co-opted, misappropriated, and misused. Conflicts were being made worse by the presence of assistance. They wondered how best to support the positive efforts while avoiding the negative impacts.
