We find that, irrespective of labour market sector, the gender wage gap among low-paid, Australian workers is more than explained by differences in wage-related characteristics. The gender wage gap among high-wage workers, however, is largely unexplained in both sectors suggesting that glass ceilings (rather than

Gender segregation by occupation is the tendency for men and women to be employed in different fields.

Occupational segregation is caused by gender bias based on stereotypical, biological and social differences between the two. There have been two types of gender segregation identified: horizontal
