The criticism of religion is, therefore, in embryo, the criticism of that vale of tears of which religion is the halo." (Marx 1975) Thus Marx makes it clear why a critique of political economy must at the same time be a science: commodity production meets real needs, it is a necessary illusion, an illusion with real content; it is the mode of existence of bourgeois society.

By centering on the 'critique' many extraneous aspects of Marx' thought will be pushed aside in order to give central focus to this powerful methodological concept. The result will be a deeper awareness of the connections between idealism and materialism, the overall continuity in Marx' writings, and the necessity to rethink Marx' concept of 'theory and practice'.

This is the text of a lecture I gave to the Marx Research Seminar at the University of Lincoln on 6th of October 2015. In this lecture I claim that the work of Karl Marx (1818-1883) was not only a science of revolution but also a revolutionary science, constituting a scientific revolution in social and political thought.

I also stress that Marx's procedure of critique is internal. He uses only such assumptions, observations, and arguments as could in principle also be used by the scholars criticized. Nevertheless the outcome of the critique is not merely a new theory but an entirely different one — i.e., a historical conception of the discipline of political economy and of its laws.
