The New 2012 Mathews Heli m is the ideal bow for those who choose not to be weighed down by their equipment....literally. It is the answer for bowhunters who push themselves to the limit and expect their bow to be a positive factor in the journey "getting there"; rather than a burden that diminishes their chances of success by slowing them down.

As a rule, longer, heavier bows shoot better, but there are exceptions to that-and the Heli-M is a notable one. Unsurprising was the bow's smoothness, which is the signature trait of Mathews' single-cam technology. The new Heli-M Cam combines an even, easy draw cycle with a draw stop that delivers a solid back wall.

Made famous by Mathews, the solocam bow operates off one cam (on bottom) and an idler wheel (on top). In order for the cam to deliver maximum performance, it should be properly set while the bow is in the static position. While the bow is pressed, the cam rotation can be changed by twisting or untwisting the bowstring and or cable.

The Heli-m is the third generation Mathews bow to offer the distinctive Grid-Lock riser, and with a cam derived from the Z7 this bow is widely regarded as the successor to that extremely popular bow. The name suggests the chief characteristic: At approximately 3.5 pounds, this is one super-light bow.

Bow Report: Mathews Heli-m | Grand View Outdoors

The ibo for the heli-m is up to 332. From what I have seen with Mathews bows they are pretty close to the advertised ibo. I can not remember the pertenage off the top of my head but a certain percentage of the bows have to meet the 332. At least that's what I have been told. The specs of the heli-m and the z7 are very similar.
