This essay is part of a broader project called The Colors of Zion: Blacks, Jews, and Irish at the Turn of the Century that seeks to recover such lost linkages in a Geertzian "thick description" which allows their members to speak for themselves. In brief, the three groups and their outside supporters regularly associated themselves with each other in a positive sense to a much larger degree than we now suppose, even as their external critics associated the groups with each other in a ...

A major reevaluation of relationships among Blacks, Jews, and Irish in the years between the Irish Famine and the end of World War II, The Colors of Zion argues that the cooperative efforts and sympathies among these three groups, each persecuted and subjugated in its own way, was much greater than often acknowledged today. For the Black, Jewish, and Irish writers, poets, musicians, and politicians at the center of this transatlantic study, a sense of shared wrongs inspired repeated ...

Underlying George Bornstein's discussion in The Colors of Zion is a worthy thesis—namely, that the landscape of contemporary identity politics masks the complex and sometimes treacherous, historical substrata upon which many of our current presumptions and critical vocabulary rest. In his treatment of the affiliations and tensions among blacks, Jews, and Irish in the period 1845-1945 ...

Spent a week at Zion in November wandering around looking at all the majestic beauty it offers. I was taken aback by the range of colours depending on how deep the shade was and how much the sun was reflecting off the walls. Here are a few images with the full range of colour from cool blue to burning orange. Dec 19, 2018 at 12:19 AM
